The parameters measured in grape juice and must enable you to recognize better the health state of the grapes, their maturity and so decide the optimal harvest time. The analysis during the fermentation is suitable for the control of sugars transformation to ethanol, and thus the requested end of fermentation is achieved and also the correct conditions for the yeasts growth, including the early detection of volatile acids. The quality control is necessary before the bottling process from the protein stability point of view, followed by determining the bentonite dose for wine fining and by precise determination of sulfur dioxide (free, total).
